HOW DO YOU FRY?

Charles Lamb, who said so many things about the food he ate, once said serve stewed sultanas with the rice. this: "Butter ill melted-that commonest of kitchen failures-puts me be side my tenor."

discriminating taste beside their tenor.

Not long ago some one who was working among the poor of a certain region said that not until she could destroy every frying pan round about her did she expect to see her people healthy. The frying pan, as it is usually employed, is indeed a curse of civilization. But as we cannot and really do not wish to destroy our frying pans we can at least learn to use them well, and insist that all food fried in our houses be fried well.

Real frying done in deep fat—fat deep enough to cover the food in ques-tion. The fat should be very hot. It then immediately cooks the outside of the food and does not penetrate to the inside at all Sauteing is done in shallow fat, in a skillet or frying pan, and we often speak of this, too, as frying. Things that are sauted are not very easily digestible and they are undeniably good to taste. So the best we can do is to cook them as carefully as possible. Use only a little fat for sauteing, and have it very hot. Turn whatever you are frying in it so that both sides cook over to begin with, so that their flavor and juice will be retained.

Meat can be pan-brolled with the use of only a very little fat, and, cooked properly in this way, it is not much less digestible than when broiled over hot coals or under a flame of gas. Put not more than a teaspoonful of fat in the skillet for pan broiling and heat it until it smokes. Then put in the meat. Sear it on one side, turn it immediately and turn it again. Turn constantly until it is done so that the juices will remain in it and it will not stick to the pan.

Have a wire spoon to remove croquettes or other fried food from deep fat. Have, also, a wire frying basket in which food to be fried can be put and then immersed in the hot fat.

When fried food is removed from the fat drain it thoroughly on paper. Have a roll of paper toweling to use for this purpose, or other clean, soft paper. The fat left on the sizzling food when it is first taken from the kettle soaks in if it is not immediately absorbed, but the paper absorbs it easily.
